

My Brother's Old Bedroom is Now the New Guestroom

I walk into the newly decorated room, and my heart sinks at the sight of a closet full of clothes that are not his; family pictures that are all not recent enough for my liking, and that will not be replaced by newer ones either; a clock flashing the incorrect time; a bowl of toiletries that will remain full; and a selection of children's books that will have to be donated instead of handed down.

KPH is a bilingual Canadian writer with deep roots, a full heart, and a yearning to set her soul in ink and paper with the help of an old, dusty typewriter. In her poems she displays the most fragile emotions through the exploration of an ordinary life. Moments of love, loss, and self-discovery, captured at their rawest on the typewriter, resonate with readers from all ages and walks of life as they speak of universal experiences and truths. Fiercely driven to ensnare all of life's little moments, she has already completed 15 poetry collections with three more on the way. She works tirelessly for her passion so that she may someday lead others to find their own meaning in her words.
